

Economic growth is one way to measure a country's success, but what else should we look at? Which do you think is the most important?

Essay:

Measuring a country's success has traditionally been attached to its rate of economic growth. While it is undoubtedly a major indicator of the well-being of a nation, it provides an incomplete view of the comprehensive development of a society. Several other factors, including social markers like education, health, and the general happiness of the people should also be considered. Of these, I believe, the level of education within a society offers the clearest representation of its total success.

Economic growth, denoted by the GDP, keeps track of a nation's financial muscle, but turns a blind eye to matters such as equality, individual health, and the long-term environmental effects of growth. In this vein, a booming economy does not necessarily mean a healthier population or a pristinely kept environment.

Contrastingly, the level of education in a society accurately mirrors its overall progress. Good education means a better-informed population, which in turn leads to the formation of sensitive governments, thereby promoting a better way of life. Furthermore, the proliferating achievements attained through education significantly contribute to a country's standing in the international community, often surpassing the reputation gained through strict financial might.

In conclusion, while the economic growth of a country is a major indicator of its progress, it can be one-dimensional and disregards other crucial aspects of societal development. On the contrary, the level of education gives a holistic picture of the success of a society, making it arguably the most significant measure of a country's overall victory.

Word count: 258

Essay translated in Korean:

가 . 가 , , 가 . (GDP) 가 , , . . , .

가 , 가 , .
가 , 가 , 가
가 , 가 , 가
가 .

Good expressions:

- 1. Financial muscle:
- 2. Turns a blind eye:
- 3. Booming economy:
- 4. Formation of sensitive governments:
- 5. Proliferating achievements:
- 6. One-dimensional:
- 7. Holistic picture of success: