

Individual greed and selfishness has been the basis of modern society. Some people think that we must return to the older and more traditional values of respect for the family and the local community in order to create a better world to live in.

- Essay:

It is understandable that some people argue that the modern age is marked by a higher level of self-interest and greed than the past, believing that maintaining economic growth through self-fulfillment is beneficial. However, I assert wholeheartedly that embracing older, more traditional values such as respect for family and community can foster a better world in which to exist.

To start with, by fostering relationships within our families and local communities, individuals can sculpt their morals and develop emotionally. In doing so, we nurture a population better equipped to contribute positively to society. For instance, a study from Goethe University in Germany reveals that societal and life satisfaction was higher half a century ago, suggesting the impact of community ties and values on societal health.

Additionally, when we respect and learn from each other, we acquire tools to weather life's challenges. Time-honored wisdom taught by the older generation, for example, can offer solutions in difficult times. Simultaneously, younger generations can educate elders about new technologies or platforms, helping to bridge the span between old and new. The resulting collective empowerment can shape a more compassionate and brighter future.

In conclusion, by nurturing familial and community relationships and learning from each other, individuals mature naturally and respect is fostered. Such balance between past wisdom and future innovations could lead to a society that thrives positively.
