

As countries develop, their populations tend to live individually or in small family units. What are the causes of this trend and what are the effects on society?

Essay:

As the progression of nations continues to advance, there is a noticeable trend towards individuals or small family units living separately. This phenomenon, an outcome of the societal growth, holds a myriad of implications for both people and society as a whole.

The societal advancement cornerstones the reason why people prefer living individually or in smaller families. Improved accessibility to opportunities serves as a catalyst for this transition. Whether it's education or jobs, the option to relocate and operate from distant locations, even foreign countries, has become an increasingly viable choice. With the emergence of a variety of activities and hobbies, personal space and individual time have become treasured commodities. A prime example of this shift can be seen in South Korea, where industrialization has drawn numerous people from rural areas to the urban sprawl, often leaving their extended families behind.

However, this shift is not without its negative undertones. As societal tethering loosens, individuals may slide into isolation, fostering a sense of selfishness and independence. Increased relocation of younger generations, for instance, often results in their aging parents living alone, causing depression and unhappiness. As a byproduct, governments start to roll-back initiatives beneficial for larger households, causing deterioration in familial relationships and a decline in birth rates, which could lead to demographic imbalances.

In conclusion, as countries evolve, a shift in family dynamics is an unavoidable corollary. While this change ostensibly presents lifestyle benefits, it also causes detriments to the basic fabric of society, which calls for measures to balance progress and tradition.
