

Should young people follow older people's advice or is it good for them to challenge older people's opinions and thoughts. Discuss both views abd give your own opinion.

Essay:

People's attitudes towards the interaction between younger and older generations have always been divided, with some arguing that youth should respect the counsel of their elders while others view it as beneficial for them to question conventional wisdom. Both perspectives have their respective merits but, in my opinion, the best course of action lies somewhere in between.

On one hand, there is a strong case for young people to respect and listen to the advice of older individuals. Elders possess a wealth of life experiences and potentially profound wisdom that has been cultivated over many years. Their insights and guidance can therefore offer invaluable lessons and help the youth avoid unnecessary pitfalls on their journey to adulthood.

On the other hand, the dynamism of youth should not be underestimated. They should be encouraged to critically question and challenge established ideas if progress is to be made. The advancement of society often lies in the ability to innovate, rethink, and remodel. Young people's ability to see things from a fresh perspective often leads to revolutionary ideas that propel society forward.

In conclusion, while the advice from older people should be valued for its wisdom and experience, it's equally important for the youth to question and challenge the status quo. Treading the balance between respectful regard and healthy skepticism could pave the way for a more harmonious society that both honors the past and embraces the future.
