

Some people say that the feeling of competition should be encouraged in children others say they should be taught to become cooperative. What is your opinion?

Essay:

In today's society, differing perspectives exist on whether we should foster competitive or cooperative traits in children. The purpose of this essay is to evaluate these contrasting views and propose my personal position.

One school of thought supports competition, deeming it crucial to children's development. Advocates stress that competing instills a drive for excellence in young learners. This invigorating, healthy competition can indeed encourage pupils to delve into their subjects, thereby expanding their knowledge and understanding. A nation's economy may also benefit from this. A case in point is South Korea where persistent competition for good university entry or jobs has played a significant role in the country's 'miracle of Han River' economic transformation.

Contrastingly, others assert that the burden of competition can be destructive. They argue that the relentless pressure to outperform peers may lead to overwhelming disappointment, with worst-case scenarios even culminating in suicide. Encouraging cooperative learning, in this view, would lessen such pressure while allowing students to engage more comfortably in their studies.

Upon consideration, although cooperative methods can decrease students' stress levels, I am of the belief that a certain level of competition should be encouraged. If channeled properly, competition can not only enhance personal development and academic success, but also catalyze national economic growth.
