

Whether or not a person achieves their aims in life is mostly related to luck. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Essay:

Some individuals attribute the attainment of life goals primarily to luck, while others fervently believe in the power of effort and hard work. Though I believe that luck occasionally plays a role in successful outcomes, I firmly insist that endeavor and diligence are crucial ends to achieving aims.

Granted, there are those who associate their achievements firmly with luck. This perception may provide a sense of comfort or alleviate pressure, especially in high-stress situations. For instance, upon receiving an outstanding exam grade, a student might attribute it to luck rather than their own effort. They believe that their success is largely due to random chance, relieving them of the strain of attributing it strictly to their efforts.

Contrarily, I believe that success is primarily a product of dedicated effort rather than luck. To lean on luck without the backing of hard work is like relying on a mirage in a desert. Numerous students, for instance, pin their hopes on luck during exams but neglect the importance of diligent studying. When they do poorly, they blame it on bad luck, overlooking the lack of effort they invested. Success, ultimately, is an outcome of continuous effort and perseverance.

In summary, while the concept of luck may provide some solace in high-stress situations, it should not deter us from the necessity of diligent effort and persistence in achieving our goals.
