

Whether or not a person achieves their aims in life is mostly related to luck. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Essay:

In the discourse regarding success and the factors contributing to it, a common topic of debate is the role of luck. While some insist on its supremacy, associating achievements largely with a favorable roll of the dice, I firmly hold that effort and preparation hold the reins of realizing ambitions.

Firstly, the cornerstone of success is often hard work and perseverance. Any recognized achiever from any field, whether it is sports, business, or the arts, will testify to countless hours of study, practice, or brainstorming that precedes the triumphs. No one wakes up blessed with the ability to craft meticulous strategies for a multinational corporation or to master sophisticated musical compositions. They are results of diligence and tenacity, sometimes nurtured over a lifetime.

Another compelling point is that luck is relative and, mostly, a matter of perspective. If a prepared mind encounters an opportunity, it capitalizes on it, subsequently labeling it as 'luck'. In contrast, an unprepared person might let the same opportunity slip by unnoticed. Hence, 'luck' can merely be a conducive environment that assists, rather than dictates, the path to success.

In summation, the perspective that life's achievements lie bound to the wheel of fortune overlooks the importance of determination and efforts. It allows one to ignore personal responsibility for their own success or lack thereof. While luck can certainly play a part, crediting it solely would undermine the essence of striving and human potential. Hence, claiming that a person's life's success is mainly due to luck is a gross oversimplification and something I fundamentally disagree with.

Word count: 268 words

Essay translated in Korean:

Whether or not a person achieves their aims in life is mostly related to luck. To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Essay:

In the discourse regarding success and the factors contributing to it, a common topic of debate is the role of luck. While some insist on its supremacy, associating achievements largely with a favorable roll of the dice, I firmly hold that effort and preparation hold the reins of realizing ambitions.

Firstly, the cornerstone of success is often hard work and perseverance. Any recognized achiever from any field, whether it is sports, business, or the arts, will testify to countless hours of study, practice, or brainstorming that precedes the triumphs. No one wakes up blessed with the ability to craft meticulous strategies for a multinational corporation or to master sophisticated musical compositions. They are results of diligence and tenacity, sometimes nurtured over a lifetime.

Another compelling point is that luck is relative and, mostly, a matter of perspective. If a prepared mind encounters an opportunity, it capitalizes on it, subsequently labeling it as 'luck'. In contrast, an unprepared person might let the same opportunity slip by unnoticed. Hence, 'luck' can merely be a conducive environment that assists, rather than dictates, the path to success.

In summation, the perspective that life's achievements lie bound to the wheel of fortune overlooks the importance of determination and efforts. It allows one to ignore personal responsibility for their own success or lack thereof. While luck can certainly play a part, crediting it solely would undermine the essence of striving and human potential. Hence, claiming that a person's life's success is mainly due to luck is a gross oversimplification and something I fundamentally disagree with.

가

Good expressions:

1. favorable roll of the dice -
2. hold the reins of - ()
3. relative and a matter of perspective -
4. conducive environment -
5. bound to the wheel of fortune -
6. gross oversimplification -
7. fundamentally disagree with -