

Some colleges encourage students to create business while they are still in school. Do the advantages of this outweigh the disadvantages

Essay:

Certain educational institutions today encourage students to establish their own business ventures while still in school. While this endeavor carries certain advantages, the disadvantages are arguably more pronounced.

The potential benefits that can be derived from this practice are indeed valuable. Schools that integrate business concepts into their curriculum offer their students a much-needed exposure to real world experiences. Developing entrepreneurial skills at a young age allows students to be better prepared for the professional world, by equipping them with practical knowledge on market trends and economic dynamics. The hands-on experience they acquire can have a substantial impact on their overall readiness for future careers.

However, the downsides of this approach cannot be overlooked. Students are already burdened with intense academic responsibilities. Adding business activities to their already packed schedule might impede their learning progress. The excessive stress resulting from managing both academics and businesses could lead to poor academic performance. Furthermore, it can be argued that there is plenty of time after schooling to learn about business and even implement entrepreneurial ideas.

In a nutshell, the experience gained through setting up a business while in school can be beneficial but ensuring a strong academic foundation should be the primary focus at this stage of life. After all, a solid academic background can significantly contribute to running a successful business in the future.

Word count: 263

Essay translated in Korean:

Good expressions:

1. integrate business concepts into their curriculum -
2. a much-needed exposure to real world experiences -
3. impede their learning progress -
4. excessive stress resulting from managing both -
5. a solid academic background -